

GREAT
PARENTING HACKS

WHAT
PARENTS
DO
— WHEN THEY'RE —
WORRIED
ABOUT THEIR
CHILD'S WEIGHT

Have you ever heard your child get teased because of their weight and felt helpless?

You've noticed them looking slightly chubby... Maybe it crept up slowly over the last year or two and you ignored it.

Maybe it became impossible to ignore when you saw a photo from a family day out, or when your child came home quieter than usual after school, that your child might be carrying a little more weight than is good for them and you're worried...

Not in a dramatic way. Just in that quiet, background hum kind of a way that good parents worry about things they can't quite fix.

The problem is you don't know how to bring it up.

You know that saying the wrong thing could damage your child's confidence.

You've seen what diet culture does to kids. You don't want that. You don't want them to get bullied, you just want them to be a normal healthy happy kid.

You're not looking for a diet plan. You're just looking for a way to help your child without a difficult conversation.

Why Most Logical things Don't Work

Most parents try one of three things when they notice their child is less active than they should be...

Most of them are logical steps but unfortunately rarely do any of them end up working out long term...

Sports clubs and organised activities

A child who is already self conscious about their body is often the last one who wants to be on a pitch or in a pool with other kids watching.

They quit within weeks. The parents feels guilty for pushing it...
The child feels guilty for quitting. Nobody wins.

Cutting back on food

The research on this is clear. Putting children on restrictive diets, even gently, creates a damaged relationship with food that can last decades.

The goal is never to make a child feel bad about what they eat.

The goal is to help them move more, feel stronger, and build confidence in their body.

Screen time battles

Taking the phone or the tablet away creates conflict without creating movement. The child resents it. The parent ends up being the bad guy.

And the moment the restriction lifts, everything goes straight back to how it was.

The problem with all three approaches is the same...

They put the focus on the child.

They make the child the subject of the intervention. Children, especially those who are already self conscious, shut down the moment they feel like a project.

The following tactic works because it flips that entirely. The child is never the subject. Its the parent instead...

The Tactic

Here is the tactic. It is simple. It works because of basic child psychology, not tricks.

For example you can tell your child you've started a gamified walking challenge and you need their help.

“Once Again the Key... Tell them you need “their” help. That you don't want to do it alone. That having them with you will make it easier to show up every day.”

That changes everything about how the child shows up. They are not the one who needs fixing. They are the one doing the fixing. They are mum or dad's accountability partner. His or her teammate. The reason he or she keeps going.

That is a completely different identity for a child to inhabit. And children rise to the identities we give them.

The following is a recommended mobile app you can use for this

You can tell them about a gamified walking challenge. Tell them it's based on Japanese science. Tell them you can earn medals by completing walking sessions.

In actual fact this example is an actual gamified walking challenge built on 20 years of Japanese research by Dr. Hiroshi Nose from Shinshu University, Japan.

Alternating fast and slow walking forcing the body into a fat burning state that beats normal steady walking. Best of all its just 30 minutes per day, thats it.

You earn medals and every medal becomes a shared milestone. Something you and your child earned together. Something your child helped make happen.

The day your child sees you earn your first medal, something shifts. They were part of that. They helped make it happen. That feeling is more powerful than any diet, any sports club, any screen time rule you could ever impose...

If you do decide to give the app a try here's a four step summarised checklist that you can do tonight.

Step 1 — This App in particular is called Stride Kai, to Download it you can just Click here to download or at their website at StrideKai.com

Step 2 — Tell your child about the challenge

Keep it simple. 'I've started this gamified walking challenge and I need a partner. Want to help me earn my first medal?' Nothing about weight. Nothing about screens. Just a challenge and a request for help.

Step 3 — Do your first 30 minute session together

The app guides every second. When to Fast walk and when to Slow walk. You walk together. Talk or Don't talk. It doesn't matter. You're both there.

Step 4 — Show them the medal progression

Show them the session what you're working toward. Let them see the Bronze medal waiting. Ask them to help you get there. You'll know you've done it right when your child will ask when you're going next.

You can try the Stride Kai App Free for 3 Days Click here to download

Also Disguised as a Parent and Child Bonding App

Even though Stride Kai is listed as a health/fitness app, to us its also disguised as a great parent child bonding app. Besides the health benefits of the app, the parent child bonding that takes place over time is priceless, it slowly becomes “your thing” you do together.

If you currently feel like you don’t connect with your child as much as you’d like, with apps like this you’re essentially getting the best of both worlds, in just 30 mins a day, you get fitter and healthier so does your child and over time it becomes “your thing” you do together and a priceless bonding experience happens over time, where eventually you can’t stop your child from talking about what's going on in their life, that to us is priceless!
